“ My condolences and deepest sympathy for the loss of a gentleman, scholar and friend. My association with Rob was short as he was taken away much too early in life. I had the honor of calling Rob a friend but I also looked to Rob for his vast intelligence, worldly insight into national health issues and a common sense approach to everyday dilemmas. I enjoyed Rob’s company in conversation of subjects often health related and his practical approach for satisfying my curiosity. His knowledge and work in vaccines was particularly fascinating. It wasn’t long after meeting Rob that I knew this man had a very special quality about him. You go through life and meet many individuals some who cast only a small light and the memory of them is fleeting, Rob was not one of those individuals. Rob’s presence remained intact with me since or meeting and I am very confident the memories I have tucked away will be part of my life now and forever. I greatly appreciated Rob for allowing me to call him friend and in some cases mentoring me, opening my eyes to a differential approach, not just in medicine but a more grander serene look at life. I don’t know if others looked to Rob for his tranquil conveyance of life, but I saw it in him and that was one of the more remarkable attributes that Rob displayed. I don’t know if I ever thanked him being the remarkable person he was, but I hope he knew in some aspect that I truly believed he was. I am not a philosopher, but I’ve always been intrigued by one particular quote, one of which I’ve pondered for decades; “the two most important days of your life are the day you were born and the day you find out why”, (Mark Twain). I am not sure if I will ever be able to find the answer regarding myself, but I’ve applied this quote to others. When considering Rob, I believe the answer is clear, he brought happiness and touched the souls of those around him. I’m not nominating him for Sainthood yet and even Rob would get laugh out off that, but Rob meant something deep and very great within me. My appreciation of him my never be realized except within my own heart, but I hope he hears my prayers and I hope one day in some distant star or celestial body our paths will cross again. You are missed my friend. Fair winds and following seas.
